Karen Huang, a doctoral student in behavioral science at Harvard working with Alison Wood Brooks and Francesca Gino, is seeking part-time research assistants during the summer to help with conducting studies on interpersonal interactions and decision-making. Ideal start date would be June 1st, and end date would be flexible in August, with an average of 10 hours per week. The research assistants will be responsible for helping to run lab studies at the Computer Lab for Experimental Research at Harvard Business School, conducting literature reviews, coding data, and interpreting methods from research articles. We are looking for individuals with a background in psychology or related field, although not necessary. If you are interested, please send your resume and a short statement describing yourself to Karen Huang at khuang@hbs.edu.
