Position Description

We are seeking applicants for a Post-Bachelor’s researcher (post-bac). The researcher will work under Emily Breza and be housed in the Department of Economics at Harvard University. It is a one-semester position to begin September 1st, 2018 with potential for extension the following semester, funding permitted.

We invite applications from qualified candidates with an undergraduate background in Economics or related fields. This position is funded through a Department of Labor grant to Emily Breza and her collaborators at the World Bank for research studying the impacts of different payroll systems on garment workers in Bangladesh. The expectation is that the post-bac researcher will aid in the analysis of experimental data collected in Bangladesh.

The position is fully funded, the salary will be competitive, and the candidate will have the opportunity to enroll in one course at Harvard College at a reduced rate. The position is ideal for individuals interested in pursuing a PhD in Economics in the future. The candidate will be part of a research community of Post-Bacs affiliated with other faculty.

Applicants should send a letter of interest and a CV to Emily Breza ebreza@fas.harvard.edu. Candidates are also encouraged to supply the names of up to two references who can speak to the candidate’s academic performance or research ability in economics.
